

The Twist

Jackson, after some investigation, discovers that the five TVs are super-sized, not the ones normally placed in guest rooms. They ultimately end up in various community halls located in the education and transport ministers' electoral districts where locals enjoy watching sports programs, while drinking the local beer. He also discovers that the education minister had suggested that Michael provide the theatre-style TVs as a good community gesture, and, in return, he would put a word into the minister of transport to ensure all TVs ordered by GLA will be off-loaded and delivered in a timely fashion.

Jackson also discovers that the school legitimately accepted both of Michael's sons. While one son is not academically focused, he is a star cricket player. The school accepts him on the condition he maintains an acceptable grade average, or he cannot remain on the cricket team and potentially will face expulsion. Michael and the school authorities think these stipulations will be sufficient incentive for his son to do well. His other son, in contrast, is academically gifted and, with proper mentoring, is likely to win all math and science prizes at the national level. Both sons are likely to be a credit to the school.